DEL TRAUMA Y LOS TRASTORNOS DE PERSONALIDAD

During the first day of this workshop, we will focus on the assessment of subtle clinical differences in clients with Borderline and other Personality Disorders, Complex PTSD, and various Dissociative Disorders. Although there are many similarities, these groups can be distinguished by the severity and clusters of dissociative symptoms. These distinctions have major treatment implications. Participants will learn to identify diagnostic profiles that help to determine the complexity and course of therapy. In addition, they will learn how to distinguish between ego states, modes, and dissociative parts, as well as learn to identify the more subtle positive and negative symptoms of dissociation. Video vignettes will be shown, and participants will have an opportunity to discuss their own cases.

Based on a careful assessment, during the next two days we will focus on practical integrative approaches to treating clients across this broad spectrum of trauma-related diagnoses, including how to work with serious comorbid problems. We can understand treatment as helping clients better integrate their unique inner psychic organization into a cohesive and adaptive whole. We will discuss what is similar and what is different in treating personality disorders, Complex PTSD, and Dissociative Disorders. What are the different treatment implications when the client has modes, ego states or dissociative parts? When should we use the concept of “parts” and when might it not be therapeutic? When is it important to work with the person as a whole versus address specific parts as a step toward integration? How do we as therapists facilitate or hinder integration? How can we know when this process is taking place and what does it look like? We will make ample use of video and case vignettes to uncover how the experienced therapist thinks through and treats these complex issues.
